How do we value cars?

Taking prices from over 3,000 car dealers and 150,000 private sellers we've got the data to help you value your car. We take information from a variety of sources and work out a price range based on your car's specific model even down to the variant, so you know that we are comparing the same type of cars with similar mileage.

The market moves quickly so we update our data daily to ensure it reflects the sort of price you could expect to get right now.

We understand that all cars come with slightly different features and in different conditions which is why we bring back a range to help you decide where your car best fits.

What could impact the value of a car?

There are a number of factors that can positively and negatively impact your car's value. We've outlined some of these below to help guide you on where your car's value is likely to fall in the range

What can increase your car's value

Excellent condition

The better condition your car is in the more it may be worth. If your car has zero cosmetic damage and a tidy interior it will likely lean towards a higher price point.

Great service history

Usually, buyers want to buy a well-maintained car that has a complete service record and not too many previous owners. Being able to prove your service history can go a long way when it comes to price.

Extra features

Everyone likes something a little extra. If your car is loaded with optional extras then assume you may get a little more for it. When selling note anything like roof racks, rear-facing camera, new sound system or other media modifications.

Popular colour

When it comes to appearance some colours can be worth more than others. Having a sporty red or jet black car could pull in a few extra dollars when selling.

What can decrease your car's value

Poor condition

The older a car the more wear and tear you may find. Usually, small stains or scratches on the paint will leave you a few dollars lower than if your car was in excellent condition. However, anything more than common wear and tear and you'll be looking at a lower price point.

Unknown service history

The valuation given will assume that your car has been well taken care of. If you haven't had your car serviced or can't prove you have done this then the value of your car could be lower than estimated.

Known issues or repairs required

Cambelt needs replacing or a window won't roll down? Issues like these could bring down the value of your car. Always be upfront about problems like these when selling.

Many previous owners

If your car has been through a lot of hands, this could impact the value of your car. Most buyers want to know about past owners and have a good understanding of how they treated the vehicle.
